2nd Opinion: 'When God is in it, the glory is his'

By Michael Bell

Prior to my election as president of our Baptist General Convention of Texas last fall, the Holy Spirit repeatedly drew me to a speech given by a Pharisee named Gamaliel.

Gamaliel's talk, found in Acts 5, was occasioned by the annoying behavior of Peter and his cohorts, who continued to do what they had been doing since the day of Pentecost; they were actualizing Jesus' mandate to witness. Jesus told them to witness. So they witnessed. At every opportunity, without thought to their own personal comfort or safety, they noisily testified about what Jesus did—everywhere, all the time.

DOWN HOME: Love means letting those chickees fly

So, this is why I lay awake all those nights.

Four years ago this summer, I endured Lord-knows-how-many sleepless nights. Our oldest child, Lindsay, had just graduated from high school and was preparing to head off to college.

Seems like every time I woke up in the night that summer, I thought about Lindsay. She still was where Joanna and I reveled in her being: Home. Upstairs. Asleep. Under our roof. Right where she belonged.

EDITORIAL: Do Good Samaritans climb Everest?

David Sharp, a 34-year-old British engineer, collapsed and died on Mount Everest last month.

The Associated Press described Sharp's death as "shocking, an apparent display of preening callousness." Sir Edmund Hillary, the first climber to conquer Everest in 1953, insisted Sharp's death was "horrifying."

Sharp reached the summit, climbing alone. But as he descended through the "death zone"—almost 28,000 feet above sea level—his lungs failed to filter enough oxygen out of the thin, frigid air, and his systems began to shut down.
