

How to fight Islamic injustice? Use Sharia as shield, Muslim lawyer says

October 9, 2009

Hauwa Ibrahim caught the world's attention in 2002 as the human rights lawyer who rescued Amina Lawal, a poor and illiterate rural woman who bore a child out of wedlock, from a sentence of death by stoning. What's less well known is that she did it using Islamic Sharia law precepts.

For Anne Graham Lotz, it's about relationship, not religion

October 9, 2009

A new book by Anne Graham Lotz- The Magnificent Obsession: Embracing the God-Filled Life -focuses on the biblical story of Abraham. She insists religion is "one of the biggest hindrances to finding God."

Only one church in three spiritually vital, study says

October 9, 2009

A congregation's health depends less on theology than methodology, according to a national study by Hartford Seminary's Institute for Religion Research.

Some call for reclaiming the lost virtue of thrift

October 9, 2009

Some social analysts say churches can become instrumental in shaping a new culture built on an old virtue—thrift. But a Baptist ethicist insists churches need to examine themselves before they can begin to preach stewardship effectively to the larger culture.

“Generosity” might say it

better

October 9, 2009

Stewardship emphases often elicit yawns— or strategically timed absences— in many churches. But it deals with some pretty attractive ideas— generosity of spirit, the virtue of thrift and freedom from debt.

Debt keeps families, churches from reaching potential

October 9, 2009

If Americans had followed biblical financial principles, they could have lessened—or completely avoided—the worst recession in decades, two prominent Christian money management specialists said.

Faith Digest

October 9, 2009

One in 10 U.S. churches employs a woman as senior pastor, double the percentage from a decade ago, according to a new survey by the Barna Group.

Activists on left, right share faith but little else

October 9, 2009

A new report confirmed long-held assumptions about religious activists from the left and right. The only thing both sides seem to have in common: faith is a more important part of their lives than among the general public.

Barna survey: Women pastors gaining ground in United States

October 9, 2009

The percentage of churches in the United States employing a woman as senior pastor has doubled during the past decade, according to a new survey by the Barna Group.

Non-denominational, Baptist churches dominate list of fastest-growing

October 9, 2009

About one-fourth of the largest and one-third of the fastest-growing churches in America are Baptist, according to an annual listing compiled by LifeWay Research for Outreach Magazine. Nearly half of the churches on the list are non-denominational.

Barna, Hispanic evangelicals, weigh in on health care

October 9, 2009

Prominent evangelical pollster George Barna weighed in on the health-care debate with a Sept. 20 editorial saying that Jesus would support universal coverage — although not necessarily through the government.

Ethicists view health care as basic right, not a luxury commodity

October 9, 2009

Human beings are fragile creatures needing health care to flourish and—in many cases—survive, said David Gushee, distinguished university professor of Christian ethics at Mercer University. And that universal need for health care makes it a human right, he insists.
