Black named Senate chaplain

WASHINGTON (RNS)-The chief of Navy chaplains was named June 17 as the first African-American chaplain of the U.S. Senate.

Rear Adm. Barry Black, a Seventh-day Adventist, will serve as the Senate's 62nd chaplain, succeeding Lloyd Ogilvie, who retired.

Black was one of three finalists for the job and was nominated by a bipartisan committee of five senators headed by Sen. Jon Kyle, R-Ariz. As chaplain, Black will open the chamber in daily prayer and provide spiritual counseling to its members and 6,000 staffers.

Baylor direction sparks debate

One male assistant professor responding anonymously to the survey wrote: "Baylor must do something to help tenure-track faculty (new hires) cope with the large numbers of tenured senior level professors who do not support the current goals/directions of Baylor-thus do not support those of us brought in to Baylor to fulfill the current mission. There is a serious and negative interaction between new and old faculty in this regard."

Job satisfaction

Tension between A and B faculty, combined with questions about the wisdom of implementing the 2012 vision, appear to be contributing to a less-than-ideal work environment at Baylor.

What is a tier one school?

Baylor University's quest to become a "tier one" school refers to annual rankings published by U.S. News & World Report.

The rankings are determined by a formula established by the magazine and have no sanction from any academic organization or accrediting agency. They are, however, highly influential in the quest to gain recognition, donors, faculty and students.

The magazine reports that its formula is "based on our non-partisan view of what matters in education."
