

Are Southern Baptists predestined to fuss over Calvinism?

June 6, 2013

HOUSTON (RNS)—Nearly 35 years after a schism began in the Southern Baptist Convention, a new divide is emerging—this time over the teachings of 16th-century Reformer John Calvin—that threatens to upend the nation’s largest Protestant denomination.

When Southern Baptist messengers gather for their annual meeting June 11-12 in Houston, they’ll receive a report, “Truth, Trust, and Testimony in a Time of Tension,” that focuses on the growing popularity of Calvinism among Southern Baptist pastors and seminaries.

At stake are fundamental beliefs on who can be “saved,” the need for evangelism and whether Baptists will retread familiar battlefields on the proper roles of men and women.

The H. Henry Meeter Center for Calvin Studies at Calvin College recently acquired a 16th-century book by John Calvin. (RNS Photo by Jolie Myers/The Grand Rapids Press) Calvinism—traditionally the domain of Reformed churches like Presbyterians—differs from typical Baptist theology in key aspects, particularly on the question of salvation. The report concludes those aspects, while important, should not divide Baptists.

Tom Ascol, a Florida pastor and executive director of Founders Ministries, a pro-Calvinist organization, called the report a positive step.

“It points the way forward,” he said. “The report acknowledges genuine disagreement, but it also affirms commonality in essentials, a commonality we didn’t have 35 to 40 years ago.”

About 30 percent of Southern Baptist pastors consider their churches Calvinist, according to a poll last year by SBC-affiliated LifeWay Research, but a much larger number—60 percent—are concerned “about the impact of Calvinism in our convention.”

Shaping the next generation

Calvinism already is shaping the next generation of Southern Baptist pastors through the influence of Al Mohler, president of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in Louisville, Ky., and popular speakers like Minneapolis author John Piper and Seattle’s Mark Driscoll.

Ascol embraces one of the aspects of Calvinism that makes traditional Baptists deeply uncomfortable—the idea that Jesus died on the cross only for people whom God had elected to save, and not for everyone.

Calvinists teach “predestination”—the idea that a person’s salvation already has been determined. More traditional Baptists say if Jesus died only for the elect, then Baptists’ trademark evangelism becomes pointless.

Eighty percent of SBC pastors disagreed with the idea that only the elect will be saved, according to last year's LifeWay poll, and two-thirds disagreed with the idea that salvation and damnation already have been determined.

"It is obvious that we all cannot be right," Ascol wrote on his blog. "At least one of us is wrong. It may be that we both are wrong. ... In other words, our differences are real. But they are differences within the family."

Selection of pastors

Eric Hankins, a pastor from Oxford, Miss., and member of the committee, said the report could change at least one important process in Southern Baptist life—the selection of pastors.

Because each Southern Baptist congregation is autonomous, local congregations hire and fire pastors. Congregations are free to choose Calvinist or non-Calvinist pastors, but both the candidate and the congregation must be honest about their beliefs, the report urges.

"We cannot assume that pulpit (search) committees will have the theological understanding of Calvinism to ask the sort of questions that need to be asked for full disclosure to take place," Hankins said.

Neo-Calvinist pastors and speakers like Piper and Driscoll have drawn criticism for how they interpret Calvinism's treatment of gender roles. For a denomination that has already said a wife should "submit herself graciously" to her husband and banned women pastors from the pulpit, it's a potentially explosive debate.

Women clergy

While some Calvinist traditions allow for women clergy and stress gender equality, a growing number of "new" Calvinists argue that, as part of God's blueprint for humankind, men and women have different roles in the family, church and society.

The 2000 Baptist Faith & Message, the denomination's comprehensive confession of faith and doctrine, already asserts a form of "complementarianism" (men and women are equal but have different roles), but some strains of Calvinism go a step further.

Emily McGowin, a doctoral candidate at the University of Dayton and former Southern Baptist, said Calvinism has the potential to rework how Baptists view women's roles even beyond what the Baptist Faith & Message says.

"Unlike what you might see in run-of-the-mill SBC complementarianism, where women's subordination and male headship is affirmed only within the nuclear family unit and the local church, many Neo-Calvinist complementarians view women's subordination and male headship as something that applies to all spheres of human life," she said.

In other words, according to some leading neo-Calvinists, men are called to lead in every sphere of life, including business and politics, and women are called to submit.

The committee did not address gender roles and Calvinism because it was not within the committee's portfolio, Hankins said. It really isn't an issue, he asserted, because the Baptist Faith & Message already takes a conservative theological position on gender roles.

Annual meeting business

In other business, the SBC meeting is expected to:

- Denounce the recent decision by the Boys Scouts of America to permit openly gay members.

"That will no doubt be discussed over and over," said Frank Page, president of the SBC Executive Committee, who expressed “deep disappointment” over the May 23 vote.

- Possibly consider a resolution that declares Southern Baptists should work with Mormons on “issues of morality, social justice, and religious liberty” but be clear that the fundamentals of Mormon theology are “not considered Christian, or part of an evangelical belief system.”