

Most Americans don't blame God for bad things in life

November 26, 2021

WASHINGTON (RNS)—Few Americans blame God when bad things happen in their lives, according to a new Pew Research Center survey that looks at how people respond to suffering in the wake of a pandemic that has killed more than 750,000 Americans.

The survey of 6,485 U.S. adults polled online in September shows Americans overall have a strong belief in God, and that belief appears to be unshaken in the midst of hardship and suffering, such as have occurred with the COVID-19 virus.

Instead, many Americans lay some blame for the suffering that occurs in the world at the feet of individuals and societal institutions. Seventy-one percent of Americans agreed that “suffering is mostly a consequence of people’s own actions.” Sixty-nine percent said “suffering is mostly a result of the way society is structured.” More than half of respondents said both statements describe their views.

“People tell us they think a lot of suffering is just part of life,” said Gregory A. Smith, associate director of research at Pew. “A lot of suffering is caused by people or systems people have created.”

Although questions about the source of suffering in the world are new to Pew, the center has previously polled Americans about belief in God, heaven and hell. Those beliefs—91 percent said they believe in God or in a higher power, 73 percent believe in heaven and 62 percent in hell—are remarkably consistent with past studies. One-third of respondents also believe in reincarnation and that, too, has remained stable over time.

Thankful for the good, sad for the suffering

When they hear about terrible things happening to people, most Americans said they feel thankful for the good things in their own lives (71 percent) and sad for those who are suffering (62 percent). Ten percent said they were happy for others' suffering because they deserved it.

A quarter of Americans also said that when they hear about bad things happening to people, they often feel the need to tune out the news because it's "just too much to take."

But American views of God are largely forgiving. More than 70 percent of Americans said they "rarely" (26 percent) or "never" (48 percent) feel angry with God for allowing terrible things to happen to people.

That's good news, said Jamie Aten, a disaster psychologist at Wheaton College. Aten said studies indicate when people blame God for the bad things that happen in life, they're much more likely to struggle with depression, anxiety and trauma.

But the survey's finding that 80 percent of Americans think the suffering in the world comes from the actions of other people may not be the perfect antidote.

"The danger in this is when we turn our blame to others we may see different levels of prejudice, bias, people harming others in groups different from themselves," Aten said. "That may be why we see so much tension toward one another in the U.S."

Half of Americans, the survey found, endorse the idea that God chooses "not to stop the suffering in the world because it is part of a larger plan." And 44 percent said "Satan is responsible for most of the suffering in the world.” Evangelicals and Black Protestants were especially likely to take this position.

Still, the survey’s finding that 69 percent of Americans think suffering is mostly a result of the way society is structured gave hope to theologian Emilie M. Townes, dean of the Vanderbilt University Divinity School.

“Over the last 20 years or so I noticed this not so subtle change in which people say, ‘We need to look at what we do to each other more,’” said Townes. “That is much more the root of most suffering rather than God deciding to punish us in some way. You see that in many forms of liberation theologies, where people are saying, ‘We need to ask why are we causing the suffering of others.’”

---

What do Americans feel when they hear about human suffering?

% of U.S. adults who say they often feel each of the following when they see or hear news about terrible things happening to people

Source: Survey conducted Sept. 20-26, 2021, among U.S. adults.

“Few Americans Blame God or Say Faith Has Been Shaken Amid Pandemic, Other Tragedies”

PEW RESEARCH CENTER

---