

Seminaries not preparing pastors to minister to disabled, some assert

May 20, 2010

An expert in the field of disability ministry says theological seminaries are doing little to prepare ministers to deal with the estimated one in five Americans living with some kind of disability.

Welcoming people with special needs can mean spiritual, numerical growth

May 20, 2010

Churches that do a good job of including members with special needs like autism often reap side benefits of a positive witness to their community and sometimes even numerical growth, says an expert in disability ministries.

First person: Anybody can be a friend

May 20, 2010

Not everyone has the expertise or ability to do something significant about a problem as big as helping families deal with disabilities, but “anybody can be a friend.”

Author describes what having an autistic child taught her about God

May 20, 2010

Kathleen Deyer Bolduc, a nationally recognized author and speaker in the field of disability ministry, said she was unprepared to parent a special-needs child before the birth of her third son.

Barriers of attitude block

people with disabilities from full inclusion in churches

May 20, 2010

A longtime advocate for people with disabilities said the greatest barriers to including special-needs individuals in churches are not architectural or language but rather barriers of attitude.

For shy worshippers, church can be totally overwhelming

May 20, 2010

Recent studies reveal introverts make up roughly half of the population. And an introverted personality can sometimes clash with the prayer-and-share ethos in Christian churches.

Faith Digest: U.S. Catholics vexed at Vatican

May 20, 2010

Nearly three-quarters of Catholics in the United States believe the Vatican tried to cover up clergy sex abuse, and a majority says Pope Benedict XVI has handled recent reports of past abuse poorly, according to a new poll, but less than 10 percent have considered leaving the Catholic Church over the issue.

End of ‘Lost’ may prompt more questions than answers

May 20, 2010

Is it a show about a modern-day shipwreck, featuring misfit castaways trying to survive increasingly bizarre circumstances on an island somewhere in the Pacific Ocean? Or is Lost really a show about faith, redemption, evil, predestination, love, suffering, free will and human understanding of the supernatural? Either way, when Lost ends its six-season run May 23, what will remain is the debate about the religious themes sprinkled throughout the hit series.

Researchers probe whether, why, free will exists

May 20, 2010

Are people really responsible for all the things they do? Do they have “free will” to choose between right and wrong? Those questions are at the heart of a four-year research project at Florida State University to determine whether, and how, free will exists.

Biomedical ethics in a brave, new world

May 20, 2010

When a Texas pastor exhausted treatments available for his multiple sclerosis and began looking at other options, he excluded embryonic stem cell treatments. But then his condition worsened.

Survey finds Africa is most religious part of world

May 20, 2010

Researchers say they’ve found the most religious place on Earth—between the southern border of the Sahara Desert and the tip of South Africa.

Catholic scholar among experts named to White House bioethics panel

May 20, 2010

President Obama has named 10 medical and legal experts—including a Franciscan friar—to a commission that will advise the White House on bioethical issues.